Meet the Professor: Jennifer McCrickerd

Bio according to the Drake University website:

She was raised in the wilds of suburban Orange County California. She went to high school in Newport Beach and felt remarkably out of place. She then went to Wellesley College, an all women's college outside of Boston.

In the following semesters, she entertained a number of majors (French, Psychology, Political Science, Economics) until settling on Philosophy as the department where the conversations she wanted to be participating in were most likely to be happening

Despite going to graduate school with only the intention of learning more about philosophy and, particularly, ethics, she learned, when given the opportunity to teach, that as much as she loved doing and reading philosophy, what she really loved is teaching philosophy. She focused her research energies on moral epistemology (the study of determining which moral theories we ought to accept) specifically looking at the work of John Rawls.

After nearly 20 years at Drake, Professor McCrickerd places herself within the tradition of American Philosophy (seeing as predecessors Ralph Waldo Emerson, Josiah Royce, William James, John Dewey). She teaches courses in ethics and political philosophy and is Director of the Honors Program for which she regularly teaches a number of courses including the required interdisciplinary course Paths to Knowledge. Her current scholarship is in the area of teaching and learning, specifically better understanding how college students learn, what is most beneficial to their success after college and ways that teachers can create environments that are most conducive to learning.

She does not give you a grade until you fight for it at the end of the semester. The reading is heavy in the start of the semester. She will channel the way you think and expand your knowledge. If you pay attention in class it is a great course. You have to be willing to speak in groups, keep that in mind.
